New Zealand Pest Control

In 2016, the New Zealand government announced a plan to eliminate all rats and other invasive mammal species from the country by 2050. These pests threaten numerous native species with extinction and cause a great deal of harm to the agriculture industry. Although it is estimated that the project will cost around US$6.5 billion, eliminating pests would result in substantial savings in future spending, as well as significantly reducing environmental damage and losses to the agriculture industry. According to ecologist James Russell of the University of Auckland, these reductions in spending and losses would make the project worth the expense.
